A World of Waste Awaits!

The National Poo Museum is a unique visitor attraction in Sandown on the Isle of Wight.

The collection contains pooey artefacts from across the world and the history of life on earth.

Interactive Exhibits

To allow visitors to get hands-on, the team have designed and built an array of exciting interactive displays that allow you to lift the lid on the astonishing secret world of poo in a variety of engaging ways.

There are things to sniff, handles to turn, pipes to talk through, buttons to press, and of course a huge collection of preserved poos to get up close to.

You can even polish a turd!

Background

Every living thing on earth produces bodily waste of some sort. Every single human poos but it's surprising how little folks talk about it.

It's true that small children naturally delight in the idea of poo - we all know they make poo jokes aplenty given the chance! Soon enough grown-ups teach them not to talk about it which is a shame because we need to talk much more about poo.

Our planet's thin organic layer is quite literally made of poo. Life as we understand it could not exist without the incredible recycling processes that happen through the production of poo every single day.

Playground

There's an enclosed small playground adjacent to the museum which is ideal to run off some steam.
